Susskind warns firms old days are gone for good

Speaking at last week’s Generals of the Revolution* event in New York, Professor Richard Susskind added his contribution to the ongoing debate about the ‘new normal’ and whether law firms could ever go back to their pre-2008 financial meltdown business models.

We’ve known and worked with Richard for nearly 20 years and seen many of his earlier predictions dismissed out of hand by the legal ‘establishment’ because they were a little too far ahead of their time, both technologically and conceptually. Today however the world has moved on to create a happy nexus between market trends and the publication of a new and revised edition of his book The End of Lawyers?

We live in the Net Generation era where people increasingly expect consumer and business transactions to be conducted online. We are also seeing inhouse counsel increasingly applying the ‘shareholder test’ to legal work and asking whether using ‘traditional’ law firm services gives best value for money. And, we are seeing a growing range of legal service delivery models emerging, ranging from inhouse to offshore LPO work.

Susskind says there is no ‘one size fits all’ model here and prefers the term ‘multisourcing’ to encompass the alternatives. As for the role of technology, although Susskind says he has yet to meet a lawyer who doesn’t believe their work is so unique it cannot be automated or commoditized, he believes you ‘decompose’ (or deconstruct) all legal work into component elements that can be handled in any of up to 12 different ways.

Susskind says these changes will have an impact on the way law firms are structured and suggests four alternative models: the Target, the Donut, the Glazed Donut and the Cog. With all of them project managing the legal process becomes key but Susskind says most law firms still don’t take project management seriously, adding “A lawyer goes on a two day course and comes back a project manager! How would they react if people went on a two day legal course and came back a lawyer?”

October’s deals

Everyone loves Microsystems  Microsystems reports that so far this year 25 law firms (both in the US and Europe) have licensed their software. These include 16 orders for DocXtools and nine orders for DocXtools modules for handling table of contents, DocID or numbering. Two firms – a large New York practice and Michigan-based Honigman Miller Schwartz & Cohn – have also licensed the DocXtools Metadata Module, which is based on the 3BClean system from 3BView.

* Microsystems has recruited Mike Plumb (ex LexisNexis Interaction) and Morag Charlton (ex Workshare) to join its Downers Grove consulting and technical teams.

Comment: To paraphrase Mark Twain, reports of Microsystems’ death (in the wake of last year’s Microsoft custom XML litigation) was an exaggeration. In a conversation we had with Microsystems’ CMO Barry Solomon last month, he said that while the outcome of the case was disappointing and had hit the Legal Templates Plus product, other parts of the Microsystems business were booming. In particular, with so many firms now either migrating or poised to move to Office 2010, the DOC to DOCX file format change had created a boom in demand for its DocXtools.

Fox Rothschild gets DocsCorp habit  Fox Rothschild has expanded its investment in DocsCorp technology with a firmwide rollout of pdiDocs Desktop PDF management and CompareDocs document comparison software.

Keno Kozie to implement DMS  Chicago-based Pugh Jones Johnson & Quandt is using Keno Kozie to implement its new Autonomy iManage DMS.

Best Authority rollout  Delaware lawyers Young Conaway Stargatt & Taylor has rolled out the Levit & James Best Authority system.

And the winner is...

Florida-based law firm Dean Mead is the winner of Winscribe’s recent BPM competition and will now benefit from a business process management makeover worth approximately $150,000.

Focus shifts to inhouse legal platforms

Along with the news that Serengeti has been acquired by Thomson Reuters (see front page) other players in the corporate legal departments market have also been active over the last week. First off the mark was Datacert who used their sponsorship of Richard Susskind’s New York lecture to (very subtly) launch their new Passport platform.

Passport takes as its starting point the fact there are dozens of different internal and external systems (DMS, ERP, ediscovery and law firm billing systems etc) feeding data into corporate legal departments and that what managers and general counsel really want is a role-based portal to provide a consolidated view of all this information to help better manage matters, risk, compliance and spend. www.datacert.com

Finally, Mitratech has launched its TeamConnect ISV partner program, which provides APIs, support and development training to make it easier for third party systems houses to develop applications that can be integrated with and will run on Mitratech’s TeamConnect Enterprise platform for corporate and government agency legal operations and GRC (governance, risk & compliance) management. www.mitratech.com

DTI deal brings Daticon saga to a close

Last month’s acquisition by Document Technologies Inc (DTI) of the ediscovery business Daticon EED brings to a close the history of one of the more colourful vendors in this sector. Although the EED (Electronic Evidence Discovery Inc) side of the business began life in 1987 and has maintained a strong reputation for innovation down the years, the same might not be said for Daticon.

Formed in 1993, a 70% interest in Daticon was acquired by Daniel Gordon in 2000. He was subsequently sentenced to 42 months in prison for defrauding Merrill Lynch out of $43 million – this sum included the money used to buy Daticon. In 2006, Daticon filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection and was bought by Xiotech Corporation. Then, in June 2008, EED bought the Daticon business from Xiotech and rebranded the group as Daticon EED. Now, after the latest deal, the Daticon name has finally been dropped and the acquired company will be called EED, a DTI company.
